In this troubled time when it seems that the world has more problems all at once than three we ought to have, people are apt to think that it can't happen here. We hope not. However, we read day of more violence in the South. Reports also stress that the Ku Klux Klan is once again growing numbers and spreading further into the North.

As we express our horror at the violence in the South, we must be aware of the dangers of ign and hate in any community. There probably are not too many people who know or remember a fright was brought to our attention this week when this picture was loaned to us. The fact is that the daylight parade of the Ku Klux Klan took place down the main street of Milo on September 23, 1953, in dubious distinction, to be sure. We understand from one of our senior citizens that the movement gained a sort of "flash in the pan" in this area. Apparently Yankee independence is not a good breeding ground for mob action. That in itself is reason enough to give thanks on this day.
